

the church should condemn the sexual revolution and all its works, which no doubt is its instinctive reaction.

Questions without answers seem to define where we're at for the time being. Here are several questions, none of which I can answer but which seem urgent nonetheless:

(1) To what extent is the "Christian" idealization of the family dependent on monasticism and the consequent attitude that the sexual life may be tolerated only for the sake of procreation?

(2) To what extent is the "Christian" notion of the family simply a way of confining the "danger" of sex within channels controllable by church and state, thus constituting, in effect, an invasion of privacy by impersonal institutions?

(3) To what extent is the sexual revolution, as I have described it, an attempt to recover for modern people something of the Gospel's imperative to live together in love? "Little children, love one another." Is it quite clear that this injunction is compatible with life centered upon the nuclear family?

(4) What can be known about the sexual attitudes and behavior of Christians in the first two centuries? We know that some of them, at least, attempted to hold all things in common. Did they do so while maintaining strict sexual privacy? Some were charged with holding orgies as "love feasts." Did only malice lie behind such rumors? Did early Christians divide love and sexuality as sharply from each other as the later tradition, especially after Augustine, tended to do?

(5) If the Gospel is "freedom" and "good news," what does it imply for the body and its relation to other bodies?

To ask such questions with at least one friendly eye on the sexual revolution does not, it seems to me, necessitate throwing all morality to the winds. One can easily see that part of the said revolution is mere anarchy, license, hedonism and recklessness. But obviously that is not all, and it would be an undiscerning eye that saw no more than this in BCTA and related phenomena. The task, surely, is to discern what may be valid, perhaps also Christian, in a style of life many now yearn for, one in which there is no simple identification between the personal and the private. In short, what is the true nature of our co-inherence, and what does it imply about the sexual secrets of our lives?
